■ Manager commentary

In January 2026, the Momentum GF Global Equity Fund gained 1.5% in US dollar terms, slightly trailing the MSCI World Index, which rose 2.2%.

The information technology sector fell 1% during the month, underperforming the broader market. While the growth of AI remains a key tailwind for some IT companies, it is also beginning to disrupt others. Since the release of ChatGPT, investors have aggressively pursued AI-infrastructure-focused companies, though this momentum has paused in recent months as markets have started to reassess which areas are most vulnerable to AI-driven disruption. The most impacted area is Software: the software and services index fell 12% in January and is down 32% over the past six months as speculation increases that AI may enable users to become expert programmers, potentially undermining the business models of many software providers. In addition, rising demand for computing power has led to sharp increases in the cost of certain components, creating potential supply bottlenecks.

Despite headwinds across parts of the tech sector, the portfolio benefited from its exposure to technology hardware. Our overweight positions in companies poised to gain from the spike in memory prices delivered strong returns, with Samsung up 33%. Conversely, Apple has been negatively affected as rising component costs weigh on production, and our underweight position in the stock reflects this view.

The portfolio's underperformance for the month was driven primarily by Industrials. A lack of exposure to defence companies proved costly, as several names delivered strong returns, most notably Lockheed Martin (+31%) and BAE Systems (+18%). Within Industrials, companies tied to data provision also detracted from performance, as sentiment in this area has turned extremely pessimistic due to fears of AI-related disruption. Key negative contributors included Experian (-16%), RELX (-13%), and Wolters Kluwer (-10%). Each of these firms benefits from a significant competitive moat built on proprietary data sets that AI-focused companies are unlikely to replicate easily. The recent sell-off appears to reflect sentiment rather than any deterioration in underlying fundamentals.
